Honokone, April 4rm, 1889.

In the educational report for 1888 Dr. EITEL deals at some length with the question of female education in the colony. Of the FOURTEEN THOUSAND AND SIX HUNDRED 8,402 children in Hongkoug who remain uneducated, a vast majority are girls. As regards Chinese girls whose parents do not aim higher than giving their daughters a The HAPS and PLANS have been mostly purely Chinese, that is, non-English, education, Dr. Eirel says the Crant-in-Aid Public School already possesses an organisa-Scheme is doing, or is capable of doing if | tion that might be readily made to meet the availed of, all that is needful. With regard to girls of this class, therefore, the school would probably do more harm than good, for it would doubtless attract a number who at present do enjoy some advantages of moral training by being sent to sectarian schools. With regard to Chinese and Eurasian girls, therefore, the Government does not seem called upon to do much more than it is doing at the present time by the Grant-in-Aid scheme. There remains the case of European girls tobe considered. Here, again, no permanent claim can be made on the Government, the girls being with very few exceptions the children of parents who can well afford to pay for their education. There erists, however, a great want for a good girls' school in the colony. Dr. EITEL says :-So far as Roman Catholic girls are concerned, be they of native or foreign extraction, ample provision has been made, under the Grant in Aid Scheme, for a modicum of female education. As regards Protestant European girls, there are two small private schools which might be enlarged or added to, with or without the help of the Grant-in-Aid Schome, if the demand for female education by this acction of the community were not so small and not so hedged in with religious and social caste projudices. The demand is, however, constantly increasmeans or other cannot be much longer deerected on a site provided by the Government. The Public School answers fairly well the requirements as regards the education of European boys, and advantage might appro printely be taken of the removal of the school to extend the sphere of its operations so as to include girls. Whether the education should be separate or mixed is a matter. of detail into which it is unnecessary to enter at present, but at very little increase of cost the building might be arranged to accommodate girls as well as boys, and if the two divisions were worked in conjunction a smaller staff would suffice than for two totally separate institutions. With the increasing numbers of the European population of the colony the provision of suitable educational facilities for girls is a subject that ought to command carnest attention, and the

BY S. BARING GOULD, " MEHADAH," " COURT ROYAL," "JOHN "THE GAVEROCKS," &C.

> First Published. CHAPTER XVIII. JOHN DALE.

In the cabin of the Conquoring Queen, M Ponnycomequick had much time for thought before he was sufficiently recovered to leave his borth. He fell to wondering what Salome and her mother, Mrs. Sidebottom and his nephew. had thought of his disappearance. "Can you got me a back newspaper, or some account of the flood?" he asked of Ann Dewis. "I am interested_to hear what happened, and whether I am among those accounted to have fallen victims." After several trials, Mrs. Dewis procured what was required in pamphlet form-a reprint from one of the West Riding papers of its narrative of the inundation, of the appearance of the country after it had subsided, from its special correspondent, and full lists of the lost and drowned. Mr. Pennycomequick read this account by the light that descended from the hatchway; road about the havor effected in Kold-dale, the walls thrown down, the cottages inundated, the roads and the embankments form up, and then among the names of those lost he read his own, with the surprising information that the body had been recovered, and though frightfully mutilated, had been identified. This was news indeed. That he was esteemed dead did not surprise Mr. Pennycomequick when he learned how long he had been ill, but that some other body should have been mistaken for his was indeed inexplicable.

"By this time," said he to himself, "Salome will have proved my will and Louisa will have exhausted her vituperation of my memory." learned. As he recovered, his mind recurred to through the last years of life, to fag out the final those thoughts which had engaged him on straws of existence." the night of the flood, as he walked on the towpath by the canal.

The very desire he felt to be back. to see Salome again was so strong within him that it constituted evidence to his mind that if he were at home, in the exuberant joy of meeting her again he would let drop those words which his judgment told him ought not to be spoken. Other thoughts beside these exercised his mind. He turned to the past, to his dead brother Nicholas and his conscience repreached him for having maintained the fend so persistently and so remorselessly. Nicholas had suffered for what he had done, and by suffering had expiated his fault. Ho, Jeremiah, had, moreover, visited the father. He endeavoured to pacify his conscience by the reflection that he had made a provision for Philip in his will; but this reflection did not satisfy him. Philip was the representative perty between her and your nephew Philip." of the family, and Jeremiah had no right to his worth.

Then he turned to another train of ideas connected with his present condition. Was his health likely to be sufficiently restored to enable him to resume the old routine of work? Would a resumption of his duties conduce retard, if not prevent, complete recovery? Would it not be a better course for him to shake himself | turn her out." free from every care-keep his mind disengaged rheumatic fever often seriously affected the heart some place where his mind might recover its somely treated by them. balance, his health be re-established—and he

He would be sorry to think that Pennycomequick should cease to be known in Yorkshire as the title of an old established reliable business associated with figured linen damasks. But was his presence in the factory essential to l its continuence? He looked at Ann Dewis squatted by the fire smoking. For seventeen years she had kept Earle Schofield's pipe going, which he had put into her month and she had been faithful to a simple request. He had put his mill into Salome's hands, and had said, Keep 'it going. Was she less likely to fulfil his wish than had been Ann Dewis to the desire of Eurle-Schofield?-

He was not concerned as to his means subsistence should be determine to remain as one dead Ho had an old friend, one John Dale, at Bridlington, the only man to whom he was not reserved and suspicious -the only man of whom he took counsel when in doubt and difficulty. John Dale had a robust commonsense, and to him Jeremiah resolved to apply. When John Dale first went to Bridlington he had been lent a considerable sum of money by his friend, which had not been repaid, but which, now that Dale had established a good practice as a surgeon, he was ready and willing to cepay. John Dale had been constituted trustee on the occasion of Janet's marriage. He had paid visits to Mergatroyd, and Jeremiah had visited Bridlington; but as both were busy men, such visits had been short and few. Though, however, they saw little of each other, their mutual friendship remained unimpaired.

As soon as Mr. Pennycomequick was sufficient. ly recovered to leave the barge, he provided himself with a suit of clothes at a slop-shop, and settled into an inn in the town of Hull, whence he wrote to Dale to come to him. He had his purso in his pocket when he was carried away from Mergatroyd, and the purse contained a few sovereigns, sufficient to satisfy his immediate pulled down; to have to see things going con-

You wanted someone to relieve you, and you have the man-the right man, already in the place."

> "I do not believe it. You have an aversion to lawyers, but let me tell you that a lawyer's office is an excellent school; there men learn to know human nature, how to deal with men, and get business habits. The fellow must have a good heart or he would not have come to an arrangement with his aunt to part with a large sum of money for Salome. Besides, Salome is no fool, and she writes of him in high praise for his diligence, his regular habits, and his kind-head down, thinking. "If you go back," said the doctor, "you will throw everything wrong. You will worry your self and will take the spirit out of Philip. Trust him. He is on his mettle. If he makes a blunder, that is natural and he will suffer for it,
